10 lb. A gambeson (also aketon, padded jack or arming doublet) is a padded defensive jacket, worn as armor. It also doubles as a winter coat for wearers. Partial armor only grants its AC bonus if you are wearing light or no armor. If you are wearing only one piece of partial armor, you are still considered to be wearing your base armor type (e.g. no armor or light armor).

Gambeson (5e Equipment) - D&D Wiki

A gambeson is a padded defensive jacket, worn as armor separately, or combined with mail or plate armor. Gambesons were produced with a sewing technique called quilting. They were usually constructed of linen or wool; the stuffing varied, and could be for example scrap cloth or horse hair. During the 14th century, illustrations usually show buttons or laces up the front. An arming doublet worn under armor, particularly plate armor of fifteenth- and sixteenth-century Europe, contains arming point

The short answer is that fabric armour (gambesons, jacks, doublets of fence - there are a number of different garments with different names) is indeed very effective, even when used as a standalone armour. But it isn't as effective as plate armour. The long answer, though, is much more interesting but more nuanced.
